Paying taxes isn't the highlight of anyone's year, but it's a mandatory task for most people in the U.S. Obviously, when it's time to pay the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), you want to make sure every detail and all the calculations are correct. That starts with making sure you prepare all your tax information with the right tax ID. Whether you're preparing tax and financial documents for the first time or you've simply misplaced your tax information, it's possible to find your personal or business tax ID number. Social security numbers are extremely sensitive because they are used as legal identification for bank accounts, credit card applications, public assistance and more. That means these entities have your social security number in their records. However, due to concerns about identity theft, they will usually require you to appear in person with several other forms of identification to prove your identity before sharing your SSN with you. Replace Your Social Security Card If you go to your local Social Security Administration office, you can leave with a new social security card in hand. Be sure to take the appropriate documents to prove your identity: driver's license and birth certificate or passport (citizen); legal immigration documents and work eligibility documents (non-citizen). If you don't need your SSN immediately, you can now request a replacement social security card online at the SSA.gov website by completing the security steps to set up a My Social Security account.
