While he makes all these unnecessary convoluted plans about how he would spread his name around the world to catch the attention of those who might have been trapped in the world like him, he essentially just solves all his problems through his raw power. His problems are more self-imposed than anything due to his tendency to be incredibly paranoid due to his fear of something that "might" be more powerful than him. And to make it worse, he just outright contradicts himself near the end of the show by risking his life in an unnecessary one-on-one combat due to his ego. Brilliant. Please see your browser settings for this feature. Pe Riyuro is the great uniter of his people and believes himself to be strong. Hejinmal, on the other hand, appears to be a cowardly failure of a dragon who spends all his time reading—though he is at least smart enough to know when to surrender. So to summarize what happened in this entire cour: First quarter spends its time on just introductions on characters that have no personality whatsoever outside of all sucking up to Momonga in perfect unison. Second quarter is about Momonga effortlessly beating an army of literal nobodies that won't matter for the rest of the season. Third quarter is about Momonga effortlessly beating an army of zombies and two bad guys that won't matter for the rest of the season. Somehow, this takes 22 minutes. often builds its dramatic tension by depicting events through the perspectives of the all-too-mortal creatures facing Ainz. This episode attempts to do
