"As IDES has always said, the majority of overpayment issues within PUA stem from the claimant's ability to establish their own weekly benefit amount (WBA) and receive benefit payment prior to any wage verification. Early USDOL guidance for the PUA program allowed for this. Over the intervening months, USDOL continuously revised guidance to states, requiring state unemployment agencies to verify wages after the claim had been submitted, approved, and paid. When claimants entered incorrect wage information, and after that wage information was verified by the Department, overpayments occurred. This is why it was, and always has been, important for claimants to accurately report the wages they earned when submitting a claim. Keep in mind that in the spring of 2020, all states were moving quickly to establish the PUA program and move benefits out of the door. State unemployment agencies have been called upon, and continue to serve, as the economic first responder in this crisis; responding to a crisis required swift action to implement new federal programs.
