Using SRP in handgun applications, unless it is specifically listed in a published reloading manual, is not recommended. Using loads I've tested over and over again, I loaded the same cartridges with SRP. Like many (un)scientific endeavors, I kept everything else the same: same dimensions, same load, bullet, temperature and loading method. In most cases, I was able to use the exact brass head stamp. I tested dozens of cartridges besides what I shared with you and used load densities that were at least around 80%. We do not usually recommend it because of how difficult reloading is making it almost impossible to do. After being struck with the firing pin, there are two small holes above the primer that serves as the ignition and blast incredibly hot fire into the base. The aftermath makes the primer very hard to remove. Also, this type is very corrosive. We do not want you to get chemically poisoned. if you are ever being chased by a taxidermist, don't play dead. What makes the right to keep and bear arms so important? Simply put, the individual right to defend against aggression is fundamental to civil society. Self defense is a natural safeguard against violations by individuals or oppression by institutions, such as an increasingly powerful and unaccountable government. History has repeatedly shown that absent this protection, dominating rulers will use force to subjugate and trample the rights of defenseless individuals.
