It's actually pretty accurate for such an awkward and poorly built gun. Yeah my son's gsg522 reliability sucks too. If it's slightly dirty, expect out of battery kabangs. And I mean bunches. Got one in August this year, same exact issues, got new magazine, no better, dealer sent it back, GSG sent a new one, couldn't believe it, new one was worse. Dealer sent it back and gave me a refund, Then he showed me something in his airgun section, The new UMAREX Classic MP 40 CO2 gun, full weight, full metal, except for the grips and lower receiver cover, as were the originals, more accurate appearance to the original, blowback, so the bolt cycles as it fires, uses 2 CO2 capsules so velocity is respectable for a bb gun, stock is functional, and solid lockup, also, like the original, it fires from an open bolt, the only difference I can tell from the original, other than the obvious, that it's a bb gun, is while the original was full auto only, this one fires semi auto, AND full auto, and it is a blast to shoot, and there are more places you can shoot it such as your basement or back yard, it also will attract attention. Indoors the sound is quite satisfying, flawless operation, just don't use copper plated bb's, use daisy zinc plated, or use umarex bb's, or if you use the copper plated ones, mix a bit of dry graphite powder, about an eighth teaspoon in a 3000 bb box, the price going for 199.99 online at pyramidair.com. In the final analysis, the GSG MP40 reminds of an ex-girlfriend (name withheld by request); it's unreliable and temperamental. You can't feed it when you want to. You never know if she's going to disappear into the bathroom and puke her guts out. But she is attractive and you want to love her. +1 on the Umarex MP40. Full auto is a "blast", even tho a BB gun. The salesman dragged out a large cardboard box. It was unusually heavy. Much to my surprise, we found a large wood crate inside. American Tactical Import's website specifically says, "No wood crate.". Well there's another steaming dumpster fire masquerading as fine Teutonic engineering. The sad part is that the MP40 wasn't all that great (by modern standards) even in 1940. Then again, an open bolt blowback gun is kind of hard to mess up. I would hesitate calling the original MP40 "engineering". Blowback open bolt sub guns are about as simple an operating mechanism as you can have for an automatic firearm. It's basically a barrel, a tube, a chunky bolt, and some springs. Just like an m3 "grease gun" you could probably knock out a close facsimile in your garage in a long weekend. When I got home I checked the chamber. The charging handle was easy to remove from the bolt. The bolt handle was so loose I worried about it falling out when shooting. I couldn't see any burs or overly rough edges from machining. The plastic grip and lower receiver cover plastic felt well made. ACCURATE, the feed ramp looks nothing like the actual German one I fired in Iraq. Mine also would FTF due to feed ramp angle, rounds have a "Dent" where the bullet hits the ramp. So, I took it home and got the Dremel out, ground down the ramp a bit more and polished it. Went back next day. Guess what? I went through over 300 rounds of everything from WinWhiteBox 115's to 147 Gr. JHP's. NOT 1 FTF nor FTE. Weapon continues to run flawlessly. Mine shows a "Proof Date" of Aug 2017. I think the longer these are out there, the more they can be honed to a much better weapon. Being a machinist, I've duplicated their trigger bar, taking that ONE INCH takeup down to less than 1/4" now. I was contacted by a company called "Atlantic Wall Blanks" after I posted one of several improvement videos on YouTube, you can buy this trigger bar and the BFA and Thread Protector I also made that now makes the weapon look more like a $24,000 MP-40. I think he sells the kit for $70 If I could share pics I would! Now I'm back into WW2 reenacting as an SS infantryman. I can't keep up with all the things this thing needs to "Look" more realistic.
